Attendance at the ESRI Annual Users Conference provided the Department of Land Management with targeted insights that will directly strengthen both the Planning Division and the Survey Division's operational capabilities. Travelers reported that the conference offered practical demonstrations and technical guidance that align with the agency's ongoing modernization efforts, particularly in land-use regulation, cadastral accuracy, hazard-mitigation planning, and public transparency.

For Planning Division staff, the conference emphasized tools that streamline regulatory workflows and improve analytical capacity. Sessions on workflow automation, digital intake forms, and dashboard-based oversight showed how ESRI's modern platforms can reduce review delays, improve data completeness, and give leadership clearer visibility into GLUC application processing. Planning staff also benefited from exposure to updated hazard-mitigation datasets and modeling tools from FEMA, NOAA, and USGS, which will strengthen the division's ability to evaluate coastal inundation, storm surge, and sea-level rise impacts. These resources support more defensible land-use recommendations and reinforce the division's role in long-range planning and resilience initiatives.

Survey Division staff gained substantial value from sessions focused on parcel fabric modernization, GNSS integration, and authoritative land-records management. Demonstrations of ESRI's parcel editing tools and field mobility applications highlighted how modern geospatial workflows can improve spatial accuracy, reduce manual corrections, and enhance field verification. The integration of GNSS Base and Rover systems with ESRI's platform was particularly relevant, offering a clear path toward more precise cadastral updates and more reliable boundary confirmation. These improvements directly support the division's responsibility to maintain accurate land records and ensure that survey data used in regulatory decisions is defensible and consistent.

Both divisions noted the importance of improved public transparency tools showcased at the conference. Interactive zoning maps, permit-tracking dashboards, and mobile-friendly public information portals demonstrated how modern geospatial platforms can make land-use information more accessible to residents, applicants, and stakeholders. These tools will help reduce public confusion, improve trust in regulatory processes, and provide clearer insight into how land-use decisions are made.

Travelers also identified opportunities for stronger inter-agency coordination with other Government of Guam agencies and federal partners. Shared datasets and standardized geospatial workflows can reduce duplication, improve consistency in regulatory reviews, and support unified planning outcomes across agencies. The conference made clear that geospatial interoperability is becoming a national best practice, and DLM is positioned to adopt these standards.

Overall, the information gathered at the ESRI Annual Users Conference will help the Department of Land Management improve operational efficiency, strengthen regulatory integrity, enhance public trust, and advance its modernization goals. The insights gained by Planning and Survey Division staff provide a clear path toward more accurate land records, more transparent public communication, and more defensible land-use decisions.

Three representatives from the Department of Land Management (DLM) attended the Association of Metropolitan Planning Organizations (AMPO) Annual Conference in Sacramento, California. The conference provided an opportunity for planning professionals, transportation agencies, federal partners, and metropolitan planning organizations from across the United States and its territories to exchange knowledge, discuss emerging trends, and identify innovative approaches to transportation and land-use planning.

The information gained from conference sessions, peer-to-peer discussions, technical workshops, and networking opportunities has provided valuable insight into national best practices that can be adapted to Guam's unique planning environment. The knowledge acquired supports DLM's ongoing efforts to modernize planning processes, improve interagency coordination, strengthen data-driven decision-making, and advance sustainable community development initiatives.

Participation in the Association of Metropolitan Planning Organizations Annual Conference was a valuable professional development opportunity that directly supports the Department of Land Management's mission and strategic objectives. The knowledge, tools, and professional connections gained through conference participation will help inform future planning initiatives, strengthen organizational capacity, and advance DLM's efforts to promote sustainable, resilient, and well-coordinated development throughout Guam.

The conference provided actionable insights that can be applied across multiple divisions of the Department and will contribute to continued improvements in planning practices, technology utilization, stakeholder engagement, and long-range policy development, ultimately enhancing DLM's ability to serve the Government of Guam and the island's residents.

Should you have any questions or require additional information, please contact Ms. Virginia Flores at 647-8500.

Senseramente,

JOSEPH M. BORJA
Director, DLM
